

noticed by Mr. Ohl, administrator to the estate of Boyd & Co. Judgment has not yet been given.

A grant of three thousand dollars has been voted by the Japanese Government to Messrs. Dallas and Ring, to enable them to visit Japan, in compensation for the late attack on them at Yedo. Mr. Ring left some time ago, but Mr. Dallas is still there. It is noticed, as strange, that the Government did not ask them to return their situation.

It is reported from Yedo that there have been several cases of cholera in that city. It is also alleged that the plague has likewise appeared there, but prompt action has been taken by the government, to prevent its spread.

THE FLOOD AT TONGCHOW.

This quiet, but fine old city, is situated on the most northern point of the Shanghai promontory. We have not two walls, cities, or by side. The wall of the "water city" runs up over the hill and along the sea shore, enclosing the harbor. An upheaving of the earth's surface at this point seems to be destroying the approach to the harbor. It was formerly accessible for the large junk, whereas now small craft enter with difficulty. The wall around this city is of stone, about a mile in circumference, and twenty-five or thirty feet high. It is surrounded with a brick, plaster, and a parapet at regular intervals. The harbor, sheltered by a small artificial island, occupies a large portion of the city, though around the banks and under the wall men have been building temples or public buildings, except one, a large Buddhist temple called Fung-tai, built on a hill in the north-east corner of the city. It is just here that the wall approaches nearest to the sea, and a peculiar cliff some fifty feet high rendered it unnecessary to continue the city wall in this direction. Upon the top of this bluff, the most prominent point of the promontory in this direction, has been erected the most extensive of the city's temples. To the south, by a broad flight of stone steps, you descend to the harbor and along the other bluff. The top of the bluff is a level, and is covered with temples and buildings connected with it.

A part of the building, just over the precipice, is two stories high, and from this elevation there is a magnificent prospect; you look down for miles upon the harbor, rocky shore, while passing the entrance to the harbor the eye runs along the low sand beach. The sea, "the ever rolling and tumultuous sea," beating against the rocks and throwing the spray high against the cliff, a fine line of smoke far away on the horizon marks the wake of a steamer. Nearer, two or three sails are in sight. A long island running north and south forms a point of view, and looking in the distance, the city of Tongchow, with its "water city," lies like a map spread out at your feet.

The city walls may be traced in their zigzag course winding over the sides of the hills and across the valleys. Every prominent building and all the temples, might be seen, but for the protection of foreigners, the city is closed at first sight like a thick green, though closer observation reveals the houses peeping from among the shady trees. In this respect, the city is a very different one from the city of Shanghai, which is sometimes experienced on this coast. Looking in the other direction, the city of Tongchow, with its "water city," lies like a map spread out at your feet.

into a quiet nook where the owner would not likely find it. In this flood the water has risen higher than during the two preceding years which occurred lately. But such storms are altogether unusual, nothing at all like them having happened for many years past. Much damage has been done to property, and some lives have been lost. It is a great calamity, and one which should be taken into consideration by the government, as it is a warning of the danger which the water has been two feet deep. I say nothing of the mandarins, who put into their own pockets the public funds which should be given to prevent such inundations. It is noticed, as strange, that the government did not ask them to return their situation.
